

Regenerative Scars

The wound is where life returns.

Design concept

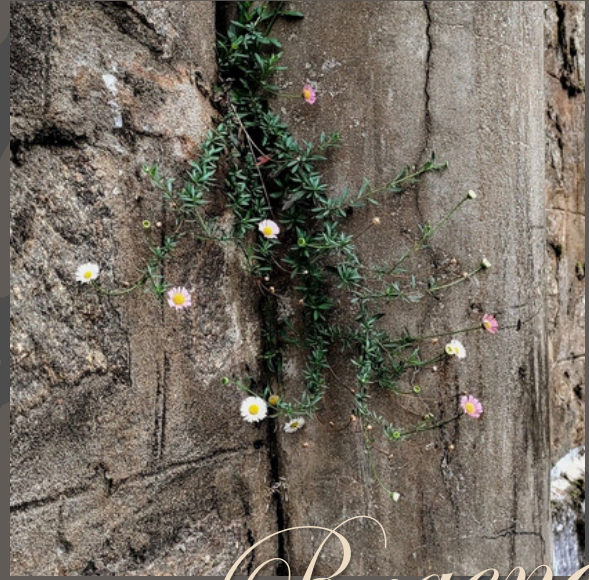

This work, titled “Regenerative Scars,” explores the process of healing and renewal in nature after damage has occurred. When the environment is disrupted, cracks and scars become irreversible traces—yet they also mark the beginning of new life.

Through irregular leather patchwork and intentionally exposed fractures, the design reflects the state of natural damage. Visible hand-stitching is used to symbolize repair, transforming “scars” into a deliberate design language. Soft materials and extending elements emerge from these openings, suggesting life growing through the cracks and creating a contrast between rigidity and softness.

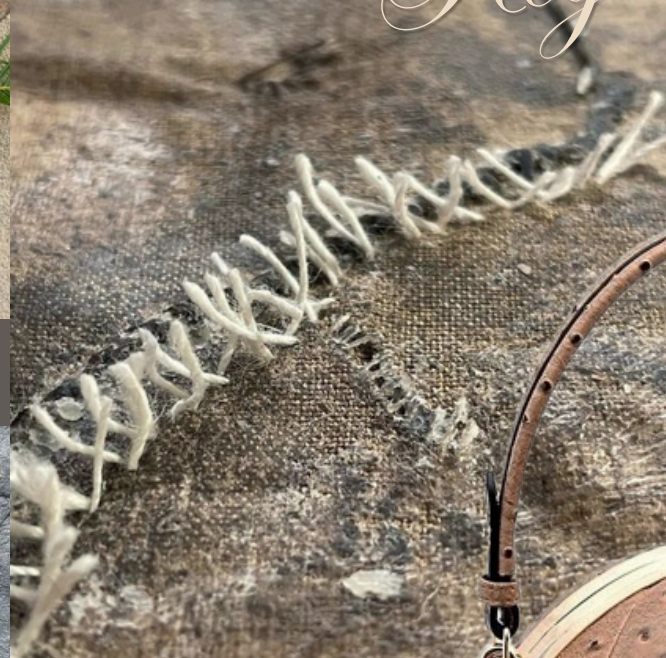

This piece emphasizes that sustainability is not only about preventing damage, but about how value can be redefined after destruction. Scars no longer signify an end, but an ongoing process of regeneration—revealing the enduring strength of nature within imperfection.
